ص □ād or swād (called □ād-ĕ-mŏhmala or □ād-ĕ-g□air-manqūt□a), is the twentieth letter of the Urdū alphabet (the fourteenth of the Arabic, from which it is taken). It occurs almost exclusively in words borrowed from the Arabic or in the secondary formations from such words. In the few Persian words in which it is found, it has been substituted, in modern times, for the original sīn or s, to distinguish them, it is affirmed, from others of a different signification (e.g. □ad, 'one hundred,' for orig. sad; and sha□t, 'sixty,' for orig. shast; to prevent their being confounded with sad, 'a wall'; and shast, 'an aim'). In Arabic it is a strongly articulated palatal s, somewhat like our ss in hiss; but in Persian and Hindūstānī its pronunciation is hardly distinguishable from that of sīn. In reckoning according to the abjad, q.v., its value is 90. As an abbreviation, it is used for, 1° □a□ī□, written on documents or accounts to indicate that they have been examined or checked, &c.; 2° for □afar, the name of the second month in the Arabian calendar:—□ād karnā, v.t. ع

ع `ain (called `ain-e-mohmala, or `ain-e-gair-manqūṭa), is the twenty-fourth letter of the Urdū alphabet (the eighteenth of the Arabic). This letter is peculiarly Arabic or Semitic, and occurs only in such Hindūstānī words as are borrowed from the Arabic, and in the secondary formations from these; or in the arabicized form of Persian words in which it has replaced an original alif (e.g. لعل la`l, for لال lāl). It is a strong (but, to Europeans and most other people, unpronounceable) guttural, related in its nature to the hamza, and ḥ; and is described as produced by a smart compression of the fauces and forcible emission of breath. By the common people of India it is sounded like alif. As a numeral it stands for 70.
